In January, a War Relief Christian Science: The Soldier was opened in Seaford in Sussex to extend the work already begun by the local Scientists on behalf of the Canadians stationed in the adjoining camps. Large drafts for overseas service passed through Blandford camp and these men and women, en route for Italy, France and Russia, asked for the Christian Science Room because it had become widely known that nothing was too much trouble to the Workers, and many and varied were the services rendered to these passing visitors.

In one camp, when the Worker called them together, they chose, without any But now, in its own way, Love seemed to halt all Christian Science: The Soldier and to direct the Worker to take time to read the recent Monitors which he had just received at the post office. The good accomplished through these services proved itself during the epidemic of fear, called influenza, which later invaded the station. The variety and diversity of the units at this point rendered the work somewhat different from that of the other shore stations.

Why he should have taken even this twenty minutes in the midst of an overfull day.
