Clark explores and constructs a historical past of poetic misogyny. This quantity brings jointly, in definitive shape, all of John Clare's very important autobiographical writings. The Marvellian associations of 'the mower', as an allegory of death, register with gentle bathos... The eternal cycle of growth, degeneration, death and life seems to pause because of a jammed ratchet.

As he makes such sheer departures from the pastoral space of ordinary, integrated perception, his attention focuses on the surfaces and frontiers of physical human identity, on windows, orifices, points of inlet and outlet. Chief among these, for me, is a failure to recognise Prynne himself as a 'Movement-influenced' poet.
