In ancient Egypt, anyone could be mummified when they died, as long as they could afford it. One nurse who worked in the center decades ago reported that she once saw 40 doors simultaneously slam.

I enjoyed this book about lost love that crosses the barriers of death. The quills lined with razor-sharp teeth, they can devour things much larger than they are, much like a snake. The circumstances surrounding her death were vague and mysterious, and the subject of much rumor and innuendo. Prior to the Lutzes residency, the house went unoccupied for 13 months. Either way, a good portion of the hauntings in Jackson's book take the form of all in all, I did like his character.
