Dill requires full sun and grows best in deep soil that's not too dense, so your best bet is to plant it outside or in a large pot indoors. To keep potted mint vigorous remove every spring and cut the root ball into quarters and re-pot in fresh Growing Herbs at Home. In the winter, woody herbs can be left outside but they should be protected from frost with garden fleece.

Parsley also needs light to germinate so only cover with a very fine layer of soil. That'll hamper their nutrition, stress them or even kill. Fresh herbs will transform your cooking but can also be used for bringing fragrance to the home or making scented oils or bath salts.

They do, however, conduct heat and therefore dry up very quickly, so always keep them covered. This will save you two to three weeks of grow time and increase your chances of a successful harvest.
