First, how unified or coherent are cultures? As a conclusion to this selective survey, I would propose that the historical preoccupation with the degree of coherence and incoherence of culture has diminished as the motifs of domination, strategy, usage, politics, and practice have infused social-scientific thinking about culture.

In any event, the intellectual development in classical anthropology toward a conceptualization of culture as inclusive and common-as contrasted with exclusive and carried by elite cultural agents-set the stage for two questions that have shaped or perhaps beset thinking and debates about culture by social scientists for a century. Such a depiction, however, is only the beginning of analysis. Such a formulation virtually defies characterization according to specific content and even suggests that too much coherence of culture would likely constitute a liability from a strategic point of view.

The main intellectual roots of this tradition of cultural analysis are found in Durkheim's sociology of religion and its stabilizing and order-maintaining functions of culture rooted especially in Durkheim's sociology of religion and its changing and transformative functions rooted especially in Weber's sociology of religion.
